In 1878, a Baseball Association was formed at Middlebury College. This was a radical change for a campus which, prior to that time, had responded to the tossing or kicking of a ball on or near college property with demerits and reprimands.

From the earliest days of athletics at Middlebury quality programs have been provided for as many students as possible. In a 1929 Carnegie Foundation report on collegiate athletics, Middlebury was mentioned among several outstanding colleges with a broad variety of programs, involving some 90 percent of the students.

In anticipation of the 100th anniversary of the scholar-athlete at Middlebury, this issue of the Newsletter is largely devoted to the state of collegiate athletics today, here and elsewhere. During the coming year, other articles will look at the history and the people that helped to shape the current Middlebury program.

Middlebury Goes to the Movies

If the industry publication Variety had a section for college recruiting films, they would be giving Middlebury a rating of "boffo" or at least "zinger."

Middlebury College: A Chance to Grow, which was produced cooperatively by the office of public affairs and the admissions office last year, has been seen by thousands of students in high schools around the country and by untold numbers of people on television. Also alumni groups, both at Middlebury and at functions in their local areas, have had an opportunity to see the 21-minute color film about undergraduate life at Middlebury.

There are now a dozen prints of the film being distributed by the New Film Company, Inc. of Boston. During the spring term they reported that 63 high schools had booked the film. Based on questionnaires returned they are able to estimate that more than 4,000 students viewed the film during that period.

The film has been seen twice on Vermont Educational Television and has been requested by other stations.

Projections for the fall are encouraging though at press time no definite figures were available.

Does it work? Admissions Director Fred Neuberger seems to think so.

"The reactions have been good from the students we have interviewed who have seen it. It removes some of the mystery about what a Middlebury student and faculty member look and sound like. Middlebury has a good reputation — students know who we are but they don't know what we are like. They don't know what the campus is like and how things look. The film is important to us for this reason."

Woodrow Wilson Fellow Visits Campus

Alan L. Otten, senior national correspondent for the Wall Street Journal, will be the first Visiting Woodrow Wilson Fellow of the 1977-78 academic year at Middlebury College. He will spend a week on campus, during November, directing of students, conducting seminars and speaking in classes in a variety of disciplines.

A veteran of three decades with the distinguished national business publication, Mr. Otten has specialized in the areas of politics and general governmental issues. At one time or another he has covered almost every beat in Washington but has concentrated on coverage of the White House, Congress and national politics. He has covered every national election since 1952.

For the past ten years, Mr. Otten has written the weekly Journal column, "Politics and People." Prior to his appointment as senior national correspondent in 1974 he was the head of the paper's 30-person Washington Bureau.

Visiting Woodrow Wilson Fellows are sponsored by the Woodrow Wilson Foundation. They are outstanding figures in the world of public affairs and include current and former journalists, businessmen and public servants. Through their extended visits to college and university campuses, they provide an added dimension to an undergraduate education.

The Right Honorable Lord Caradon (Hugh Footo), former British Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, was a Visiting Woodrow Wilson Fellow on campus earlier this year.

Notice of Intent to Publish Personally Identifiable Information

Under Public Law 93-380, The Family Rights and Privacy Act of 1974, Middlebury College has the right to publish personally identifiable information about its students, past and present, that is protected annually. The information referred to includes address, telephone number, date and place of birth, major field, activities and awards while a student, and occupation and other institutions attended. This information may be used in directories, in articles in College publications, in press releases etc.

Those who do not wish such information to be used without their permission should notify the Director of Alumni Relations (Box 500, Middlebury College, Middlebury, VT 05753), by Dec. 31, 1977.

All Things Considered

New Appointments. There are 31 new faculty members joining the Middlebury community in the 1977-78 academic year. The 12 women and 19 men are distributed among the four divisions with eight each in the humanities and foreign languages, six in the natural sciences and five in the social sciences. There are also two new appointments in physical education and one in classics.

In addition, there has been one College wide appointment for the academic year. Joseph W. Neubert will hold the title of visiting diplomat for 1977-78. A senior foreign service officer and an expert on Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, Mr. Neubert was dedicated to increased Ibero-American cooperation and greater understanding of Hispanic culture.

For many years, Mr. Neubert has been named chairman of the department. He will remain as chairman of the English dept. and will continue to teach.

David Ginevan, formerly assistant treasurer and budget director, has been named associate treasurer.

John Palmeri, C.P.A. and former manager, controls and budgets-University operations, at Yale University, has been named comptroller and budget director.

Alan L. Otten, senior national correspondent in 1974 he was the head of the paper's 30-person Washington Bureau.

The Right Honorable Lord Caradon (Hugh Footo), former British Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, was a Visiting Woodrow Wilson Fellow on campus earlier this year.

In 1951, the late Edward Laroque Tinker, scholar, author and world observer, assisted Middlebury College in its efforts to establish the School in Spain. For many years, Mr. Tinker had been dedicated to increased Ibero-American cooperation and greater understanding of Hispanic culture.

To further these interests, he established, in 1959, the Tinker Foundation in New York City. Earlier this year, that foundation renewed Mr. Tinker's relationship with Middlebury through an award of $45,000 for scholarships for Spanish language students. The generous grant will be spread over three years and will provide assistance to students both at the Spanish School on campus and at the School in Spain.

The Louis Calder Foundation of New York City has made a grant of $20,000 to Middlebury College. The funds are restricted for scholarships for promising minority and low-income students from the metropolitan New York area. Generous support from the Calder Foundation for

FALL '77
Annual Giving Record Set

With the participation of more than 47 per cent of the alumni body who gave $500,000 to Middlebury College this year, the College has reported a total gift from all sources to Middlebury of $2,132,000 as of June 30, 1977.

This total figure includes a new record setting Annual Fund gift of $676,280.

One of the factors behind the Annual Giving record was the outstanding gifts of reunion classes this past year. The 25th Reunion gift of $39,547, presented by the Class of 1952, was made by 60 per cent of the Class and marked a new high figure for the silver anniversary group. The Class of '52 used some $33,000 of their overall gift to establish the Class of 1952 Scholarship Fund.

The 50th anniversary Class of '27, with 75 per cent participation, gave a total gift of $13,362 with $9,260 earmarked for the existing Dean Eleanor S. Ross Scholarship Fund.

Another reunion class that gave special consideration to scholarships was the Class of '37. In honor of their 40th Reunion they gave $9,874 and directed that most of it be applied to the Class of 1937 Scholarship Fund.

Other reunion gifts that set new records for annual giving came from the Class of '41, celebrating their 35th (cluster) Reunion. Their gift of $18,091 was the second largest class gift this year and broke a two year old record for the 35th Reunion gift. Also, the Class of '72, with its gift of $4,750, broke the record for the Fifth Reunion Gift set in 1970.

For further details of this year’s giving to the College and for a complete list of donors, please turn to the Donor Roll which begins on page 21 of this issue.

Alistair Cooke to Deliver Fulton Lecture

Alistair Cooke, urbane and sophisticated observer of United States history and culture, will deliver the 1977-78 John Hamilton Fulton Memorial Lecture at Middlebury College on May 2, 1978. Arrangements for the relatively rare public lecture by the journalist and commentator were recently completed by President Olin C. Robison.

Known to millions of Americans through his three landmark television series, Omnibus, America: A Personal History of the U.S. and Masterpiece Theatre, Mr. Cooke has been an observer of American lives and times for some 40 years.

In 1938, following a stint as film critic for the British Broadcasting Co. and London correspondent for NBC, he was named special correspondent for American affairs by the London Times and from 1941-43 he was American feature writer for the London Daily Herald.

In 1945 he began his 27 year association with the Manchester Guardian, first as United Nations correspondent for three years and then as chief U.S. correspondent. It was through his commentaries in this publication that he became internationally respected for his perspectives on U.S. developments.

But it is, perhaps, as an interpreter of American culture to Americans that he is best known in this country. Omnibus, the award winning series which ran from 1952 to 1961, brought live performances by American artists into the home for the first time. It popularized such figures as Leonard Bernstein, with his stimulating analyses of Beethoven and jazz, Maurice Evans as Hamlet, Maria Tallchief with the American Ballet Theater and Amahl and his three night visitors.

The lessons of American history were presented in dramatic form to American audiences in 1972-73 with the award winning America series. This series, which has been repeated annually since its original airing, crossed many lines in evaluating this country’s past and raising questions about its future.

Mr. Cooke has been recognized for his achievements on both sides of the Atlantic with awards ranging from knighthood and...
The Role of the Trustee in the mid-70s

by Mary Brackett ’36

In mid-August, some 40 members of the Middlebury College Board of Trustees, spouses, and senior college officials gathered on the campus for an unusual three-day conference. Its purpose was to examine the role and responsibilities of trustees and to consider the future state of the College, in a relaxed setting — an opportunity not generally available during the hurried process of committee sessions and quarterly business meetings.

In four intensive sessions, moderated by board chairman Arnold R. LaForce ’31, the group heard from trustees Albert W. Coffrin ’41, U.S. District Court judge and Hilton A. Wick, president of the Chittenden Corp., on the legal liability of members of the board in matters concerning endowment, personnel and “educational malpractice,” and from investment counselor Willard T. Jackson ’51, and College treasurer Carroll T. Rikert on the College’s endowment, investments and methods of reporting finances and planning the budget.

President Robison reported to the group on the various developments affecting the future of the College including such matters as preliminary notice of the new federal regulations on equal opportunity for the handicapped.

Providing the keynote for the conference was Mary Brackett ’36, academic dean of Norwalk Community College and a trustee since 1969. Dr. Brackett’s address on “The Functions and Duties of Middlebury College Trustees” provided a mid-’70s update to a similar statement by chairman LaForce which appeared in the News Letter in 1970.

Dean Brackett’s talk is presented here in order to help provide a clear understanding of what is meant by trusteeship and of how these individuals, who are responsible for the future course of the College, perceive their responsibilities. Many of the issues brought up in Dr. Brackett’s talk were treated in detail later in the conference.

On a previous occasion when Middlebury College trustees held a summer meeting such as this, Arnold LaForce made an eloquent presentation which I’m sure many of you read in the News Letter afterwards. Following on the upheavals of the 60’s, it was appropriate at that time to attempt to answer for students and others, including faculty, such questions as, “What do trustees really do?” or even, “Why have trustees at all; why not let the community (students and faculty) govern itself?”

Times have changed, and although I am not sure that improved trustee performance deserves the credit, there does seem to be greater acceptance of the need for a board of trustees today. Perhaps the convenience of having a distant and somewhat impersonal body to shoulder the blame for unpopular decisions has been recognized. That is not meant to be as flippant a remark as it may seem. Actually there are times when it is appropriate for the board to perform just that function and take the heat off those individuals who must deal with other people at the local level on a personal basis.

Even though the voices are less strident today, I still hear questions about the proper function of trustees. I hear them from newly elected board members; students ask us what we do, or what we are supposed to do, when we have the opportunity to meet with them for a meal and social conversation; and it is sometimes apparent that we do not always agree completely among ourselves about our proper role in relation to the College administration, faculty and students.

This is not surprising. Originally boards of trustees served as a legal entity, holding the institution’s charter and applying the authority granted through the charter to the designated purpose, in Middlebury’s case, providing a liberal arts education for young men and women. In the early days and actually for a rather long period of time, trustees were regarded as the proper group to see to the financial and property affairs of the institution, and indeed they usually were men more skilled in dealing with such matters than the president and college officers who were frequently members of the clergy and viewed as men of great learning and high ideals but unformed and not very capable when it came to practical matters.

This is certainly not the case today. Most colleges probably have in their president and his top administrative staff as much expertise in budgetary, fund raising, property and management matters as can be found in the average board of trustees. It is still necessary, however, for the board to exercise its legal authority and make policy decisions in financial and property areas to avoid the conflict of interest situation which would result if staff were making all such decisions and in effect employing themselves and setting their own working conditions.

In preparing these remarks and thinking about the responsibilities of Middlebury trustees in particular, I have borrowed freely from an essay, Effective Trusteeship by J. L. Zwingle, a past president of the Association of Governing Boards of Universities and Colleges. I have also taken advantage of the opportunity to ask a few college presidents, past and present, what they would like to say about the role of the trustee if they had this opportunity. On two points all agree: 1) trustees should not become involved in the operation of the institution, and 2) trustees have an important role to play in putting the president in touch with potential donors.

There also seems to be basic agreement that the first duty of a board member is to understand the purpose of the institution. This seems to me not to be a problem for Middlebury trustees. We all know the College well; we share the same belief in the value of a liberal arts education, the necessity for a faculty of high quality who will emphasize good teaching as well as scholarly achievement, and we believe the setting in rural Vermont lends a peculiar dimension to the lives of the young men and women who spend four years here that gives a Middlebury education a quality all its own.

The statement that board members should not become involved in the operation of the institution is based on course on the conventional wisdom that trustees determine policy, the administration carries it out. Simple as that may sound, the real situation is far more complex. For the most part, trustees are dependent on the president and his staff for the facts on which policy decisions are based. Board members also need and want the advice of professionals when they are called upon to make decisions on academic matters. Where individuals are involved, in admissions, in faculty promotion and tenure needy students at Middlebury has had a significant effect on the College’s minority scholarship program for the past five years.

Eight members of the Middlebury community were inducted into the Middlebury College 25-year Club this year. They include Leslie Bigelow, prof. of philosophy; Mahlon Cram, Snow Bowl crew; Paul Cubeta, vice-president of the College and director of the Bread Loaf School of English and prof. of English; A. Hunt Ewell, prof. of psychology; Agnes Harrington, dining halls; Augustus Palmer, custodial services; Carroll Rikert, Jr., treasurer, and E. Kirk Roberts, prof. of chemistry....Recently at sea — David Clague, asst. prof. of geology, aboard the deep-sea drilling vessel Glomar Challenger, continuing his investigation of the Emperor Seamounts in the Central North Pacific, and asst. prof. of geology William E. Elms get Shots

Stately elm trees gracing the Middlebury College campus have been receiving preventive medicine under a new program instituted this summer by plant engineer Harvey Drinkwine.

The elms have been receiving inoculations of Lignasan, a relatively new chemical solution being used as a preventative in healthy trees and a retardant in diseased elms. In use for about three years, Lignasan has proven to be the most successful treatment to date for controlling Dutch elm disease.

Although the College only lost six elms last year, Mr. Drinkwine predicted that the future for elms in general “doesn’t look bright. We decided to try the latest treatment before the disease becomes a real problem on campus.”

Mr. Drinkwine compares the Lignasan program to cobalt treatment for cancer patients. He said the chemical attacks the fungus which blocks the flow of sap in a tree, but warned that the process is a preventative and not a cure. About 80 healthy and diseased elms have been treated so far at Middlebury with more scheduled for an injection.

According to Mr. Drinkwine, the College plants far more trees than it loses. During the past year, only six trees were taken down while 100 were planted, including the re-introduction of chestnut, which itself was infected and became largely extinct more than a century ago.
In August, 1976, at Alumni College I, a small contingent of "charter students" joined with some emeriti and spouses for three days of sustained intellectual challenge. It took two tables to accommodate the groups and the classes were run like small seminars.

This year, more than 60 alumni and parents of present and former students swelled the ranks of Alumni College II, tripling the enrollment — and more than half of the charter group returned again.

They represented Canada and 14 states including Louisiana, North Carolina, Michigan and Iowa and most of the northeastern states.

AFRICA

In 1969, then chief of national security, Henry Kissinger, directed the preparation of a study memo for President Nixon on conditions in Southern Africa. Among its conclusions was the following: "The whites are here to stay and the only way that constructive change can come about is through them. There is no hope for the Blacks to gain the political rights they seek through violence, which only leads to chaos and increased opportunities for the communists." For the balance of the Nixon and Ford administrations, U.S. policy in Southern Africa was based on this document.

If the critical situation in southern Africa confused Kissinger and others setting foreign policy, it has had an even more confounding affect on the average person trying to sort out the revolutions, the intertribal conflicts and the international implications of the rapid changes in governments and allegiances among African countries.

A need for clarity brought some 35 alumni college students to the conference table for four intense days of discussion of "Southern Africa: explosion or accommodation," with John Spencer and Nicholas Clifford, both of the Middlebury history dept.

The classes ended, on Sunday morning, with the preparation of a position paper, with majority and minority views, to be sent to U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, Andrew Young.

"Those attending the class worried that they didn't really know enough to prepare the paper but, like most students, they knew more than they thought," says Prof. Spencer.

POETRY

To English Prof. Robert Hill and Asst. Prof. David Price, who ordinarily "spend a lot of time spitting wooden nickels to get the undergraduates' attention," the concentration of the 21 adults gathered in their course because they simply wanted to read, discuss, and learn more about poetry, was at first "almost frightening." And certainly to most, if not all, of the participants in "Change, Death and Permanence: Frost, Yeats and Stevens, Poets of Our Time," the prospect of exposing their own ignorance of the complexities of poems by the three poets under discussion was daunting at the outset. By noon of the first day, however, it was pure delight on both sides.

To the sessions the faculty brought both erudition and vast enthusiasm; the students brought real desire for understanding and the mature insights of their own experience. If the purpose of the seminar was to send away the participants wanting to read more Frost, more Yeats, more Stevens, it succeeded beyond all expectation.

As David Price put it, "Poets do not write for 18 or 20 year olds, nor to get rich from anthology rights, but to help themselves and others survive."

MUSIC

For an hour one morning, a group of people sat in a corner of the barn on the Bread Loaf campus intensely listening to a piece entitled Water Music by the contemporary Japanese composer Takemitzu. The work consisted solely of the raw material gained from the sounds of water, electronically detached, rectified and reshaped into a musical piece.

George Todd, prof. of music, could have offered a course on Mozart, but then everyone who attended would have liked Mozart. This year's Alumni College course, however, was appropriately titled "Taking a Chance: Contemporary Music." A few of those attending understood the music but most were not sure and were seeking an opportunity to immerse themselves in this contemporary art form.

At the beginning there were comments like "What do you do with it? You can't clean your bathtub to it, or go to a bar and listen to it — you can't even go to a concert hall and hear it."

Soon the comments had switched to, "I miss the structure in it but it has a sonic ingenuity, it's interesting. It's like a tone poem."

In setting the tone for the course, Prof. Todd stated that "The question is not whether it is music or not; the question is how do I address it musically? What is it to ask a musical question?"

"The students left feeling there was beauty in the music and that contemporary serious music is a very rewarding literature," says the Middlebury professor. "At the final cocktail party I overheard one of our original skeptics explaining a contemporary piece to somebody from another course. It was clear that she was speaking as a friend of the music."
decisions, the procedures which have been established are a proper matter for board concern and approval. From that point on judgments should be made by members of the professional staff and the only concern of a board member should be whether or not the procedures have been carried out properly.

Most members of the academic community have been willing to leave the policy making with regard to management of resources to trustees. This is an area which was challenged during the 60's, however, and students in some colleges are still questioning the nature of some investments in the college portfolio. It is also not unheard of to hear cries of pain from faculty members and some students if the trustees seem likely to vote a new athletic facility in preference to an addition to the library.

Perhaps the most troublesome area is that of academic policy as it relates to curriculum and course content. John J. Corson in an article, "Trusteeship 1977 Style," claims that trustees of earlier generations have delegated too much authority in academic matters to presidents and they in turn to faculty, that the academic enterprise is what really counts in a college or university, and since trustees must bear the ultimate responsibility, they should be more involved in the decisions. He recommends asking questions and learning more about what goes to without interfering in the operation. In his words, trustees should "keep their noses in operations that they may keep their fingers out." There are faculty members, I am sure, who might well regard questions about the content of their courses as an infringement of their academic freedom and I am not aware that any Middlebury trustees are inclined to ask such questions. When an institution is sued, however, because a student claims that a course was not what it was purported to be, trustees cannot fail to be concerned. I cannot say I agree completely with Mr. Corson, but his point of view raises some interesting questions.

At Middlebury major changes in academic policy do come to the board for approval. Most of us feel that we should rely on the judgment of the faculty in such matters and the faculty probably agrees. Perhaps we should study proposals for curricular change more thoroughly.

Clark Kerr, former chairman of the Carnegie Commission on Higher Education, has compiled a list of trustee obligations. High on his list is the matter of board membership. In a self-perpetuating board such as ours, this is clearly a board responsibility. Good balance and composition do not just happen. Each member has the responsibility to be alert to potential new members and to give some thought to the general composition of the board. Dr. Kerr points out the need for members who are sensitive to but not committed to the views of the several constituencies that relate to the institution. Our alumni trustees, for example, are nominated for election by the alumni but once elected they have the welfare of the College as a whole as their primary concern and their position on the board is no different from that of any other member.

Also on Clark Kerr's list of trustee duties is the obligation to protect the essential independence of the institution from external control. The federal government has become an increasing threat with more and more regulations that impinge on the autonomy of colleges and universities. It is a trustee obligation to be aware of legislation that may have harmful effects and of course use any influence we may have to counteract it. For an institution, just as for an individual, prudent management of resources is essential to maintaining independence. All colleges are more dependent on federal monies today than they were thirty-five or forty years ago, and some dependence is probably unavoidable. Middlebury's decision not to accept federal support for the Language Schools at a time when N.D.E.A. institutes were flourishing around the country has always seemed to me an example of wise action in this respect. Many of those programs folded as soon as federal support was withdrawn while our Language Schools are strong today.

As trustees carry out their responsibilities with respect to the management of the institution's resources, they cannot fail to become aware of the need for careful planning for the future. The board, more than any other group within the College, has the long term life of the institution as its special responsibility, and meeting this responsibility necessitates trying to anticipate such problems as the nature and level of future enrollments, changes in student interests that may affect faculty staffing, and other problems that will affect the ability of the institution to meet the challenge of changes in the economy and social patterns. This type of planning is a task for the president and his staff. Asking the right questions and insisting upon plans is the duty of the trustees. In a good working relationship the president will assume leadership, but he should not have to labor to whip up interest any more than he should have to be prodded to produce plans.

Dr. Kerr speaks of the need for countering the survivalist mentality so prevalent in the academic community today and suggests the selection of an active president as one means to assure forward motion. We have all heard that selection of a president is the single most important, some say the only important, action ever taken by a board of trustees. Middlebury did choose an active president in Dr. Robison. I think we can agree, however, that it is no longer appropriate for good board members to make the selection and then sit back and leave everything else to the president.

Some trustees may feel that they have no special qualifications to bring to the obligations and duties that have been mentioned. What about the board member who is not skilled in financial affairs, who has neither the wealth to become a significant donor nor contacts with wealthy or politically influential individuals who might be helpful to the College, and no special area of expertise not already represented at a higher level on the College staff? What can such a person bring to the task?

Every trustee, I believe, can perform the very important function of serving as a bridge between the special goals and values of the College and the surrounding society. The entire academic community, not just Middlebury College, needs this kind of sympathetic interpretation today when so many are questioning the value of a college education, and particularly a liberal arts education. We are in a period of social and intellectual change and readjustment. Trustees, alumni trustees especially, with an intimate knowledge of their own institution, can serve that institution and the whole academic community by explaining, interpreting, and, in general, bridging the gap between the College and parents, alumni, and friends who often have a hard time accommodating themselves to changes in an institution they have known and loved.

This task of interpretation cannot be accomplished successfully without a real understanding of the College as it is today, and acquiring that understanding is, it seems to me, an important duty which each one of us as trustees should assume. We must make the effort to gain a better understanding of the new attitudes, motivations, and life styles of students and younger members of the faculty. Our time during the week ends of regular board meetings is limited, but both the administration and the committee on undergraduate life have tried to create opportunities for us to meet with students and faculty on an informal basis. Using these occasions to the best advantage is not only an obligation but a wonderful opportunity to continue and enlarge upon the education which some of us at least started at Middlebury College a very long time ago.
This fall, 66 sons and daughters of Middlebury College graduates began their education at the College.

Alumni parents represent classes from 1935 to 1960. The Class of '56 tops the list with 10 parents followed by '51 with nine and '50 with eight.

In the words of one parent, “It makes you feel reincarnated to see that the children of all your friends are together with yours at Middlebury again.”

With an adjustment in the fall academic schedule and a late date for Labor Day, the myriad of activities that usually precede the opening of classes got compressed into a two day period this year.

On Tuesday, Sept. 6, as the faculty met at Bread Loaf for their annual fall convocation, the 514 students that comprise the Class of 1981 were arriving on campus and were laying claim to their dorm rooms.

At noon the still somewhat disoriented students, along with family and friends, got their first introduction to the College's food, faculty and first family at a luncheon in Memorial Field House.

Orientation began right after lunch and was confined to a day and a half with classes beginning on Thursday morning.

The Class of '81 was drawn from 3,500 applications and is 52 per cent male and 48 per cent female. An additional 88 students will join the freshman ranks at the start of the spring term.

Domestically, the new freshmen represent 39 states and the District of Columbia. The greatest concentration hails from Massachusetts (101), New York (88), Connecticut (52) and New Jersey (50). Large groups come from other states in the Northeast with good showings from Illinois, California, Minnesota and Ohio as well.

There are also 19 foreign countries represented in the class, with the largest group coming from Canada (6) with England (3), Iran (3) and France (2) next in line.

Some 63 per cent of the new arrivals graduated in the top 10 per cent of their high school class.

that this will lengthen into a longer appointment..."

But Howard Munford’s relationship did not begin there. Neither was it summed up with a salary. Howard graduated from Middlebury in 1934. As an undergraduate he was on the track team; he met Marion, his wife; he studied Am. Lit. under that dynamo, “Doc” Cook, and when he left college it was with that deep-seated desire in the hearts of so many Middlebury alumni to return. Return he did in 1941 to dedicate most of his life and hazard his fortune with the College. This month marks the end of his active career.

It is also the end of something unique in academia. Middlebury’s Am. Lit. dept. was the first of its kind. It was begun by Prof. Wilfred Davison who taught “Doc” Cook the way to train his sights, who in turn taught Howard. Each man was a part of the other, a part of the discipline, a part of the College and a part of the department. Their identities in large measure became irrevocably immeshed in these areas. In a sense, they all represent another time. They worked not primarily for money, for notoriety, for fame, but for the cause of conscience. It is what we mean at Middlebury when we say Am. Lit. With Howard’s departure a continuity of half a century will be interrupted.

As an undergraduate at Middlebury, as a member of the department of Am. Lit. since 1941, as an officer in the Navy during World War II and as a protege of Perry Miller in graduate school at Harvard, Howard Munford’s career has been one of splendid distinction.

By temperament a natural teacher, what gives his teaching its special distinction is the uniting of a warm supportive feeling for the achievement of his students and an understanding of their interests, with a passionate feeling for American literature and its importance in reflecting a national culture.

Like his mentor, Dr. Perry Miller, he is an intellectual historian of ideas. And the root of his devotion — Whitman’s “varied and ample land” — has been the object of his perceptive clarity of mind and infectious enthusiasm. Above all, it is a clear-headedness, quick to pierce to the heart of an issue or to the gist of a problem or to the core of a situation, and the steadiness with which he keeps his balance and poise, that has given all of us confidence in his genuine ability.

But if we had to isolate one quality in Howard’s temperament, which has enabled him to add distinction to the truly great profession of teaching, it would be a pride in excellence — the Greek arete — practiced with a critical intelligence. His equal is hard to find in any faculty, but for over 35 years it has been our good fortune to have had the companionship of such a steady, clear-headed, and devoted scholar-teacher-friend as Howard Munford. At this stage in the game it is a trifle late to wish him the whaler’s best, “Greasy luck,” but we can wish him something else — fair winds.

RICHARD W. COLMAN, JR.

In his eight years at Middlebury, Dick Colman has become a moving force for the best values of liberal education, exhibiting a quiet, strong leadership in all parts of the community. He has given new life and a new direction to the athletic program at Middlebury College and, in so doing, enlarged and enriched the experience of all of us. Delighting in every good thing, he nurtured the good wherever he was present.

Born in New York City and raised in Caldwell, N.J., Dick entered Williams College where he became one of the most versatile athletes in the school’s history. While serving as his class president for four years, he went on to win letters in six different varsity sports, while at the same time earning All-American honors in football.

After graduating, Dick remained at his alma mater as an assistant football and head lacrosse coach before moving, with his head coach, Charlie Caldwell, to assume the same duties at Princeton University. After succeeding Caldwell as football coach at Princeton, Dick went on to win an amazing 70% of his games and in his 12 year career won four Ivy League titles.

Since coming to Middlebury and the land that he loves, Dick’s accomplishments have been no less impressive. Under his guidance, the physical education, athletic and intramural programs have been totally revitalized to the extent that Middlebury now stands as a leader among its sister schools. By instituting an innovative lifetime sports program, which offers 33 different activities, Dick fulfilled his deep conviction that physical activity is an important aspect of the totally educated man. Accompanying the lifetime sports offering is an intramural program which provides additional recreational opportunities to over 65% of the Middlebury student body. And finally, Dick has instilled a new drive and spirit within the intercollegiate spectrum. He has shown that the scholar and athlete can be blended into one whole, brought together by the common denominator of dedication and commitment to excellence.

Dick was also instrumental in helping organize the “Presidents’ Conference” now known as NESCAC, which has become a forerunner among academic institutions attempting to bring a sense of balance back into intercollegiate competition. In addition, he was a prime mover behind the development of Fletcher Field House, which has enhanced not only the bulk of the student body but many a short-winded faculty member as well.

He is the embodiment of the total man; equally at home in discussing the latest football trend, picking up jocks and towels in the locker room, or delving into the left bank nihilistic existentialism of Jean Paul Sartre.

Dick and his charming wife Shep have brought with them a vitality and zest for life unsurpassed in the Middlebury community. We are happy to hear that they will remain part of us and know that Dick will relish the new life ahead of him, whether it be sailing, gardening, sugaring, antiquing, wood chopping or saving the whales...
This past spring, three members of the Middlebury College community retired from their respective posts as secretary of the faculty, professor and director of athletics.

That simple statement says nothing of the loss to Middlebury of three individuals whose dedication to the College, its students and its ideals, is already legend. What follows are excerpts from the tributes read into the minutes of the final faculty meeting of the 1976-77 academic year.

MARION E. HOLMES '33

Faculty meetings will be different next year. But before you start cheering, the change will not be for the good. Marion Holmes, our quiet friend up front, retires this year after a career of service that has earned her a unique place in the College. Her roles are so varied that few of us are familiar with all she has done, but we know well how faithfully she has served this faculty. It will be difficult and dangerous for us to carry on without her. She is the only person in the world who knows our rules. And over the years, keeping records of these meetings, she has developed the remarkable ability to make our debates sound rational. Marion seldom speaks at these meetings, but when she does, it is usually to save us from imminent self-destruction.

Marion is a Vermonter, a graduate of Middlebury College, and even a graduate of Middlebury High School. She has served the College virtually all her life, as registrar for 20 years before becoming secretary of the faculty in 1969. She does things so well it is easy to forget they're being done.

But job titles and descriptions hide more than they reveal. Marion’s may be the most political job in the College. For years her diplomatic good humor has made her the logical person to handle all the nasty sensitive jobs which affect our daily lives. No matter how bizarre a new grading system the faculty invented, Marion made it work. No matter how outrageous a department’s scheduling requests became, Marion accommodated them. No matter how ridiculous each individual’s demands, Marion listened with good humor and found a solution. Not that everyone got what he wanted, but indeed, everyone who came to Marion left satisfied and wanting what he got. Nor did Marion accomplish this magic by any deviousness or debating skill. Rather, while dealing in the areas which turn faculties most surly, she drove us, by her own example, to uncharacteristic reason.

Marion’s true love is the outdoors. She has paddled the solitude of Vermont’s rivers and streams. She has skinny-dipped in the wilderness lakes of Minnesota. And she had hiked the length and breadth of Vermont and much of the rest of the country. Like all those who wander the Green Mountains, she draws strength from the challenge hidden beneath the inviting green we see from this campus. And those who know Marion know the strength and independence just below her gentle surface.

The usual cascade of superlatives seems inappropriate here. Not because those words don’t apply, but because they don’t describe the way we know Marion. Her ways are not spectacular. Most of us cannot remember when we first realized she had done for us. We came upon our feelings for Marion rather like the discovery that Spring, unnoticed, had somehow arrived, and that, because it had, today was better than yesterday.

HOWARD McCOY MUNFORD '34

The following are excerpts from two letters written by Middlebury’s past President Paul Moody:

"...He is intelligent, with a quick and straightforward reaction. His character is of the best, and also his personality. He is clean-cut, manly and tactful. He is completely cooperative, conscientious and dependable. He can be counted upon for hard and sustained effort... It is a pleasure to be able to recommend him without any reservation whatsoever."

This is a recommendation for a young man who received, in 1941, another letter: "We are looking forward to your being with us... The salary will be $2,000 and our confident expectation will be"
“On the athletic field, men are vulnerable, but it is precisely because they are that they no longer are isolated from each other. The stresses and strains, through which the athlete explores the limits of his potential, reach deeply into his being and rip from him any pretense, duplicity or artificiality. The struggle to become is a highly visible process... Ultimately, it is a struggle which has as infinite a capacity to destroy as it has to create. If it is perceived only as a struggle to win, to dominate or to succeed, it can devastate the naked and vulnerable athlete, and unravel the fabric of community. If it is viewed and appreciated as a struggle against a common failing — the ability to be all that we are — it can weld friendships and produce a communality bound together on the most fundamental of levels; the uncompromised respect and appreciation due all individuals as unique human beings.”

John Cleve Livingston in “The Politics of Sport”

In attempting to organize my thoughts for this article I found myself in a state of conflict since the original article was to be entitled, “In Defense of Intercollegiate Athletes.” My initial thought was to react negatively to being placed in a position of having to defend what I believe to be a viable and integral part of Middlebury College. The English professor is not asked to defend his course in “18th Century Poets,” why then should the football coach defend an aspect of collegiate life that has been with us almost as long as our educational system. And yet, there are probably very few things which our society is as divided, vague, or ambivalent about, as it is concerning the place, value, and conduct of intercollegiate athletics within our educational structure.

I believe, very simply, that this is a result of placing all colleges within the same philosophical framework, when in reality this is impossible to accomplish. The idyllic “frisbee” contest between Amherst and Hampshire Colleges has absolutely no relationship to the frenzied pace of an Ohio State-Michigan football game. We are really talking about two quite different types of programs which can be loosely classified as “major,” or “small” college athletic programs.

I find myself in a position where I cannot logically defend “major college” athletics, but this does not discount the fact that there are some benefits derived by both the participants and colleges themselves. There is no question that “major college” athletics has, for the most part, become a business venture and, as such, is obligated to be as successful as possible. Herein lies the root of the controlling ethic of these programs for, when transcribed into the idiom of the athletic field, it means that, above all else, that program must be successful and hence, a winner.

With this as the paramount goal, the athlete is no longer viewed in the same context as the non-athlete. Because of his or her athletic ability, the athlete is set aside from the rest of the student body in order to better facilitate the team’s chances of winning. The recruitment of this athlete becomes the heart and blood that can sustain the program. Hundreds of thousands of dollars will be lavished by coaches and alumni to insure the best possible product with which the coach can mold his winner. In addition, the athlete is lured by the offering of “athletic scholarships,” which are awarded based on athletic ability, regardless of need or academic potential.

Unfortunately, this is many times accompanied by a blatant lowering of admission standards, to the point where the athlete cannot carry a normal course load. James Michener, in his revealing book, Sports in America, cites the case of a young athlete who, from the 7th grade on, was passed with straight A’s even though when admitted to college he couldn’t add 9 and 12 and wouldn’t Unlike our "major college" associates, at Middlebury the student and athlete are indeed a single entity. Middlebury and its sister schools Amherst, Bates, Bowdoin, Colby, Hamilton, Trinity, Tufts, Wesleyan and Williams have recently formed an alliance (The New England Small College Athletic Conference or NESCAC) with the expressed intent of insuring the integrity of the student-athlete, while at the same time avoiding some of the pitfalls of "major college" athletics. The over-emphasized area of recruitment of athletes has been minimized to the extent that coaches may only have contact with students either at the college or at functions sanctioned by the alumni and open to all students. Financial aid is based solely on the family's need and is awarded on the same basis as it would be to a physics major or oboe player. And although some consideration is given to the athlete in examining his academic records, the athlete must still meet the general admission standards of that particular college. The student-athlete then becomes merely part of an homogeneous student-body with the same incentives and motivations for furthering his education.

There are some who will still find fault with athletics even when played within the framework of the "small college" philosophy. The critic will say that intercollegiate athletics reaches too few students, and has in fact become an elitist body in that it deals only with the superior athlete. And yet, within our philosophy of providing a "liberal" education, it is legitimate to offer a senior English seminar to a selected group of students who have both the desire and ability to progress in that area. The athlete, like the English major, is offered the opportunity for a unique learning experience which may not be feasible or found desirable by the rest of the student body. Through his sport, the athlete not only is confronted with the personal challenges of trying to fulfill his potential but he is also provided with a highly unusual experience in group dynamics, which may be unsurpassed in his college experience. The athlete, unlike the senior seminar student, is no longer confronted with just controlling his own personal drives and desires, but rather he must learn to integrate these in order to be a viable part of the group.

There are others as well, who find fault with the highly disciplined structure and nature of most of our athletic teams. They see the coach, in his position as the ultimate authority figure, as inhibiting the natural flow of creativity nurtured by the total freedom of choice. Strangely, these same criticisms are not directed toward the choir director who, with the mere wave of a baton, initiates an instantaneous response to his actions.

The score and the director are controlling the interaction of each voice, but the end result, not unlike that of the athlete in his own experience, can be exhilarating for both the singer and listener alike.

The intercollegiate athletic program, like all of those programs offered at Middlebury, offers a quality and level of attainment unsurpassed by its peers and, as such, needs no defense. The search for excellence has no limitations and should be a goal shared by all educators.

It is indeed a rewarding and fulfilling experience for me to have the opportunity of contributing to a program whose philosophy and goals are one and the same with those of the College. I feel very fortunate to be here at Middlebury, because all the joys of coaching exist here for me. The challenge of working with and influencing young men, the satisfaction of organizing and implementing the program, and the thrill and excitement that come from being part of the game itself, all combine to make this one of the most rewarding and satisfying coaching jobs in the country. All this and the beauty of Vermont as well — you can't beat it!

Mickey Heinecken is asst. prof. of physical education and football and tennis coach at Middlebury College.
recognize that 12 and 9 would yield the same answer. The repudiation of the educational tasks by some coaches and administrators is one of the great paradoxes in education, since athletics, in its early years, was nurtured by the college faculty and students.

Unfortunately, this is the side of intercollegiate athletics that is most visible because of the exposure by the media. However, by far the greatest number of colleges competing in athletics have disavowed themselves from the “major college” philosophy and, instead, are working hard to show that the pursuit of excellence on the athletic field can indeed be a legitimate educational objective.

Here at Middlebury, the goals of our athletic program are in complete accord with the educational philosophy of the College. Certainly the goal of education is not merely to develop the mental processes, but to include the emotional, creative, and physical aspects as well. True education includes the conscious employment of methods, disciplines and materials to develop these aspects. But there can’t be any clear cut method for developing each aspect alone. Therefore, you can’t offer one course to develop the mind, another to develop creativity and yet another to deal with emotions. Likewise, within athletics, the goals and benefits are all interrelated, and it becomes impossible to disassociate one from the other.

I intimated earlier that many of the abuses found in athletics stem from an over-emphasis on winning in order to sustain the program, and anyone who has attended a Middlebury football game has certainly noticed that a great deal of time and effort has been devoted to “winning” the game. And quite honestly, it’s very exhilarating to win. But yet I don’t find this antagonistic with sound educational goals. The surgeon certainly never operates on his patient without the fullest intention of bringing about total recovery and thus “winning” his case.

The problem therefore lies not with winning, but with the degree of emphasis placed on it. If our team was to lose to Notre Dame by one point, I would be ecstatic, since in order to accomplish this end, the team would have had to have played far beyond its abilities. Conversely, if we beat “Podunk U.” by a point, the win would have no meaning, since it would be apparent that we didn’t play to our potential. What is of course evident here, is that it is the striving for excellence that is important, and whether it be in the philosophy class, the chemistry lab or on the athletic field, is immaterial.

It is very easy to be critical of the competitive nature of intercollegiate athletics and certainly, when associated with the “win at all cost” philosophy of the “major college” programs, this competition may have some detrimental results. But it is all too easy to overlook the fact that the real competition occurs in dealing with one’s self and in striving to become everything one is capable of becoming. Athletic competition then provides a mechanism where the individual is placed in a “less than life” situation but is confronted continually with the choice of utilizing his or her abilities to their fullest potential. The actual act, competing against another team, merely provides an added incentive for bringing out this result. It allows one to appreciate and empathize with the joy of human accomplishment which then becomes internalized and part of one’s personality.

In my experience in football I have often equated practice sessions with the laboratory experience. Unlike its academic counterpart, which is involved with gaining practical academic experience, the football practice becomes a laboratory in cooperation, discipline, decision making under pressure, and commitment. And just as the laboratory course ends with an exam, so too does the football practice culminate with its own exam on Saturday afternoon. But as with any test, it is only a measure of what’s been learned and should not become an end in itself.
A.n outstanding lacrosse player at Middlebury, Jed Maker now undergoes the grueling hours of a medical resident at a large hospital. His work at the hospital is hardly regular or routine, so he is forced to accommodate his running passion “whenever I can,” as he puts it.

“I began a little over three years ago,” he explains, “when I was in med school at UVM.” Interested primarily in fitness, Jed just started running — a couple miles a day. His first marathon experience was hardly an event for which he trained rigorously.

“I was just in Boston the day of the Marathon in ’75,” he says, “so I ran in it.” An unofficial entrant, he finished the race in about four hours. He now describes that effort as “foolhardy.” At the end of that race, he was exhausted, beaten, and hurt, but nonetheless hooked. From that point on, his training became more intense, preparing for the day he would become an “official” entrant, a status one earns by running a sanctioned marathon elsewhere in better than three hours.

Having increased his mileage dramatically, his weight dropping from 185 to 165 pounds, Jed entered the Champlain Valley Marathon. His time: 3 hrs. 2 min. — excruciatingly close to qualifying. Undaunted, he entered the Sugar River Marathon in Wisconsin a few months later, and shattered the three hour barrier by 11 minutes.

This year, in his first Boston Marathon as an official participant, Jed ran what he considered a “disappointing” race.

“Tought I was ready to run about fifteen minutes faster,” he explains, “I don’t know exactly what the problem was — the hills, the heat, travel fatigue — I guess it all caught up with me. I had been doing training times much better than this one.”

Jed does not know if he will run in Boston next year: “This one took a lot out of me,” he confesses. With his 2 hr. 53 min. time, he does qualify automatically for the 1978 event. He is maintaining his training regimen (10-12 miles per day, five days a week, with a 16-20 mile jaunt on weekends), running in some shorter races, eventually competing in the Skylon Marathon in Buffalo with Peter.

“It certainly has gone beyond fitness,” Dr. Maker says of his running. “It’s a habit, a kind of therapy for my life.”

Peter Lebenbaum has been running seriously for only two years, but is now addicted. “I love it,” he says. “My wife, Faith, runs up to 12 miles a day, so running has become a family thing. We organize our lives around running.”

Before Boston, Peter had run in only one marathon, the Skylon. He had trained assiduously for this race on the hills near his home in Warsaw, N.Y., and ran a remarkable 2 hr. 32 min. race (the world record in the marathon is 2 hrs. 9 min. 55 sec.) finishing 22nd in a field of over 900 runners.

A psychologist, Peter is in private practice near his home. For most of his running career of two years, however, he was a clinical psychologist at Children’s Hospital in Buffalo, 50 miles from his home.

His rugged training program had him arising at five A.M. to run 12 miles, then driving an hour to work, completing a full day at the hospital before driving home and running another six or eight miles at night. The weekends saw a longer workout of 20 miles through the hilly contours of Letchworth State Park.

Peter approached Boston with great anticipation after his Skylon qualifying time. Like Jed, he was disappointed with his Boston experience. “It was unbelievable,” he says, “the most painful experience of my life. I had blisters by the eighth mile and stomach cramps by the 12th.

“I almost stopped (1975 winner and record holder, Bill Rodgers, did stop). I don’t really know why it was so bad — the heat was rough and I didn’t drink enough liquid. The hills were worse than I thought they would be. A combination of things, I guess.”

His Boston “setback” hardly has diminished Peter’s enthusiasm for marathon running. Claiming to have some “Walter Mitty in me,” he is planning to win the Skylon Marathon. “Running is great sport,” he affirms, “great competition, without pressure. My wife runs, my mother and father have started running, our friends run — we have created a rarefied atmosphere. It’s a great way to live.”

Paul Witteman was not at all disappointed with his first marathon. He calls it “the most unbelievable experience in athletics I have ever had.”
In Pursuit of Loneliness:
The Marathon Persons

By Karl L. Lindholm '67

It cost Jed Maker '65, a few hundred dollars and certain disruption of his hectic life. On Sunday night, he had flown in from Madison, Wisc., where he is a medical resident at the Univ. of Wisconsin. In Boston, he joined friends in Dedham, reminisced about good times back at Middlebury in the '60s, and tried to get a good night's sleep.

On Monday, April 18, Jed, Peter, and Paul joined nearly 3,000 other people of all ages and sizes in the 81st annual spectacle of the Boston Marathon. After saying good-bye to friends, they checked into a local gym in Hopkinton, Mass., changed into their brief running outfits, threw their civvies on a truck bound for Boston, and headed for the chaos of the starting line.

On this beautiful spring day, with temperatures in the 80s, these three Middlebury graduates in their 30s, along with a dozen more Middlebury students and graduates, battled the heat, the hills, and the 26 miles, 385 yards from Hopkinton to Boston. Approximately a million fans cheered them along the route.

Jed and Peter started at 12 noon, 1,000 places apart. Jed’s number and seed was 671, Peter’s 1798. Paul started about 12:10 P.M., another 1,500 places behind Peter. Jed and Peter finished in front of the Prudential Building near Copley Square, only four minutes apart, Jed with a time of 2 hrs. 53 min. and Peter with 2 hrs. 57 min. Paul, who had hoped to make it to Wellesley (the halfway point), crossed the finish line in downtown Boston about two hours behind Jed and Peter.

Jed and Peter (and now Paul) are serious amateur athletes. In the past three years, they have joined a burgeoning number of people engaged in America’s fastest growing participant sport: distance running. In the past year alone, 3,600 runners completed the 26-mile plus distance of an official marathon in under three hours (that’s six to seven minute miles).

Once weekend tennis players, Jed and Peter now spend from one to two hours...
Everyone has his own best kind of day for running a marathon. Mine happens to be a cloudy day, not too much wind, the temperature about 50. It doesn’t even matter if it rains a little. Just so long as it isn’t hot or sunny.

On a Sunday in October a few years ago in Detroit, it happened to be my kind of day and there were some 120 men and women out to run the 26 miles, 385 yards.

The Motor City Marathon is run on Detroit’s Belle Isle Park, an island in the Detroit River. Of the five marathons I had run at this point, this was the most pleasant setting and certainly the flattest. Belle Isle doesn’t have a grade that is noticeable even after 21 miles of running. The island is wooded, has lakes with ducks; Canada is across the river, the towers of Detroit down river, yachts at the Detroit YC, ships going up and down the Great Lakes. Even if there is a wind, and there was, it blows in your face for only a couple of miles at a time.

The moments before a marathon present a confused picture of multi-colored warmup suits, officials checking registrations and handing out numbers, changing in the locker room, getting a last chance at the toilets, pinning on numbers, non-runners carrying blankets, coats and bottles of “special, secret formula restoratives,” a few runners jogging around for warmup. Then there is a movement toward the starting line near the Coast Guard station. Some sweat pants are off and bare legs look cold in the brisk wind and 52 degrees. Occasional mist feels cold.

The race director blows his whistle several times. “The course is 4 1/4 times around the island, keeping to the outside road all the time. Times will be given at the 5 mile marks. There are two water stops; one at the finish line and the other across the island from here. Any questions?”

Shirts are off now, numbers flapping in the breeze. If it rains, a lot of them will be falling off. Then the call, “Runners ready?” Crack!

Heads all around begin to bob up and down and the group starts moving, first shuffling, then crossing the line, and settling into a running pace. The front runners are already streaming out far ahead. Won’t see them again until they lap you. Others move slowly in front and gradually pull away, or gradually drop back and you pass them. The excitement at the start of a race and the freshness of the runner results in a faster pace than may be intended.

Near the starting line the first time around, I caught up with an older gentleman with a 300 series number, a 50-year old. I ran with him a little while and talked. He had lost 20 pounds and his doctor said he had the heart of a man 40 years old. He was 59. He talked about being 60 soon and being the youngest in an age group. I told him that there were probably quite a few very good runners in their 60’s — at least that is what I found upon becoming 50.

We had just gotten our time at 5 miles — 40:33. That was considerably faster than my friend wanted to go, so he told me to go on, he was going to slow down. I saw him in the locker room at the end of the race. “Finished last, dead last,” he said, “But I finished!”

Monitoring conditions in various parts of the body all checked “ok.” Feet feel fine — adjust lacing a couple of times. Feel warm enough with long sleeve ski top and yellow nylon T-shirt. Breath coming fine. Stomach “ok” too. Toward the bottom of the second lap, mist and drizzle, right in the face as soon as I turn the sharp corner onto The Strand. The strain of pushing against the wind is immediately evident in the legs. Landmarks come and go. When the blue Great Lakes Museum shows around a bend, the distant trees are beyond the finish line. Crossed the line to begin my 3rd lap. The leader, wearing No. 1. flashed by and was soon out of sight.

After making the bend at the Coast Guard station the wind is still in the face, even stronger because there is nothing ahead but the horizon on Lake St. Clair. Must have shifted some to the north. In another half mile the road curves around by the yacht club and the wind comes behind helping you along and warmth returns.

Coming up the third lap the wind was not as bad because the drizzle had stopped. Caught up with a couple of young fellows one of whom was doing some walking. Asked one, “Isn’t that a girl up ahead?” He said it was. She was about 150 yards ahead. It was almost another circuit of the island before I caught up with her. The timers at 15 miles said I was 2:07:11.

Just past the yacht club alongside the golf course is a little bridge over a small waterway. Last year, again in the fourth lap of the same race, the temperature 8 or 9 degrees colder, a steady rain, I made a pact with the devil that I would quit the race if I finished running that 4th lap. I ran the resulting 21 miles in 2:48 (8 min. per mile) and could have quite easily finished under 4 hours. Quitting that race has been a matter of hurt pride ever since. As I passed that spot today I assured myself that this time there would be no such foolishness.

Checking the monitors I found the various physical elements operating satisfactorily. There was some tightness in the thighs, but the feet and wind were fine. A spell of slight nausea had...
beer and late-night chow, over 30 bachelor syndrome.

His assignments for Time had taken him all over the country, working odd hours, eating rich foods, hardly living the austere life of the marathon runner. Now, however, running is a central feature of his busy life as he finds time to run up to 10-12 miles a day.

Paul was inspired to compete in the Boston Marathon from having watched last year's race. His original plan was to survive until Wellesley, 13.5 miles into the race. His conditioning, he felt, would take him no farther. He was able, however, to experience the frenzy of the finish line — because of a little help from a friend.

He describes his experience: "I shot my wad running through Wellesley; I wanted to look good in front of all those people. I was trying to make it to Route 128 so I could catch a Green Line bus to meet my friends at the finish line.

"I drank a lot of water and started to walk when I felt a hand on my back. A voice said, 'Gotta get moving again... you can do it.' I turned around and saw that these words of encouragement came from another competitor, a very old man.

"I started to run again, with him, and we talked. I found out that he was a 75-year old practicing dentist from Indianapolis, who started to run when he was 68 to ward off body degeneration, memory loss, and other problems associated with age. Now he runs all the time and feels great."

Paul is convinced that he would never have finished the 26-mile course without the help of this senior citizen friend. "There were times I wanted to kill this guy," he admits, "I just wanted to pack it in, quit. But he wouldn't let me."

Middlebury was represented in even greater numbers than Jed, Peter, and Paul in the 1977 Boston Marathon. Geoff Birdsong '65 entered unofficially with Paul, and struggled with the course for over five hours. Also, a contingent of current Middlebury students cut their classes and traveled to Boston to compete in this grueling event: Ty Danco '77, Jim Goulet '77, Tom Hanlon '77, Les Lange '78, Barb Lange '80, Mike Weaver '79 and Peter Briggs '79.

Another competitor was Enid Wonnacott, the 16 year old daughter of Dean of Students Erica Wonnacott. A sophomore in high school, Enid is already one of the top female middle-distance runners in Vermont. She did finish her first marathon — and intends a return engagement next year.

Reliable reports indicated too that a small number of Middlebury staff members (claiming to be visiting sick aunts) were part of the throng lining the course. One Old Chapelite termed his experience as a spectator as a "peak cultural experience" and has encouraged his aunt to be sick about April 18 in upcoming years.

The Boston Marathon has been called "the world's greatest sporting event." With 2,933 starters and nearly 2,000 finishers in this year's race, and a million fans, one would be hard pressed to locate an athletic contest which involves so many in-person participants.

The spirit of the day makes the Marathon so appealing. World class runners compete alongside athletes whose outstanding credential is their enthusiasm. Spectators, too, bring an unrestrained enthusiasm to the event, applauding, encouraging the most inexperienced plodder as well as the Olympic stars.

If you have the good fortune to get to next year's Marathon in Boston, reserve a special cheer for Middlebury runners: the diminutive psychologist from upstate New York, the young M.D. from Wisconsin, the reporter from Time — or anyone else with "Middlebury" emblazoned on the front of his T-shirt or who has that distinctive "Middlebury look."

Karl Lindholm is asst. dean of students at Middlebury and was one of those good nephews on the sidelines.
The '76-'77 Annual Giving Campaign closed in June with gratifying results. The $600,000 goal was exceeded by $72,000, and a new record was set. Although I am now Chairman, it was Jane Hyde Christopher '51, who provided the leadership and the energy in establishing the Class Agent system for the Alumni. She, the individual volunteers, and the staff of the Development Office, deserve a well earned “Congratulations!”

I think it is important to stress the significance of this achievement by pointing out that the amount raised was double the Annual Giving total of just two years ago! I believe the results are proof that Middlebury’s alumni will respond when called upon, and particularly when the financial needs of the College can be demonstrated. Without the money raised by the Annual Giving program, Middlebury would be unable to provide sufficient financial aid to students and to maintain a balanced operating budget.

Our '77-'78 goal of $750,000 is consciously ambitious. I submit that our predecessors provided the necessary financial nourishment to keep Middlebury healthy when we attended and many of us received some sort of aid. Accordingly, I believe it’s our turn, in fact, our obligation to help assure the College’s preparedness to attract and educate succeeding generations of students.

Achieving 112% of the '76-'77 goal would not have been possible without the gifts of many loyal parents, friends, corporations, and foundations. On behalf of the Alumni Association and the College, I extend my thanks to all who helped make this past year an outstanding one for Annual Giving and hope that your response in the coming year will continue to be generous.

been weathered. So on down to the water spot and a drink and short walk to provide some respite.

Caught up with the girl at the bottom of the island near the big fountain (all boxed up for winter now). It turned out that she was a Canadian from Mississauga (Toronto) with whom I had run awhile in the Toronto Police Games last summer. She had a nice easy stride and was moving well. She dropped back as we turned the corner into the wind and I didn’t see her any more. She finished, though.

Rain has started going down the fourth lap and I could feel the cold drops tightening up my calf muscles. It was still blowing head-on going up The Strand, and everything was a blur. But the museum finally came into view, and those distant woods and the last lap would soon be started. No one was at the 20-mile sign so no time. The finish line slowly drew near with a small but enthusiastic crowd of officials, supporters, friends, wives, etc. “One to go.” “You’re looking fine.” “Keep it up.” “Smile.”

I tried to smile, but at 21 miles with five to go, and the rain driving and the wind blowing, it wasn’t easy. But the course was now rolling up behind, you don’t have to go this way again, just half of the windward leg next time, let’s beat that 4:00 hours. Yet, with the best intentions, reaching to the depths for a little more determination, the will to continue doesn’t come easily.

They say that you have gone half-way in a marathon when you reach 20 miles. I felt, though, that physically I was in good shape. The long miles of training, 330 in the last 60 days, were paying off. I hurt, my thighs were beginning to ache more, I was feeling what they say is hypoglycemia, the deficiency caused by the body’s inability to manufacture sugar as fast as it is used up. But I felt that I would recover quickly after I stopped running and the best way to stop running and start recovering was to get around the damn island one more time and cross the finish line.

On that last lap I did walk some, but unlike past marathons, not for extended periods of time. Run a hundred yards or so and walk five or six steps. A drink of water at the water stop. Another at a fountain at the bottom of the island, and then, the turn into the wind, and just beyond the corner a little cardboard sign swaying precariously on a slim stick, the words “25 Miles.” Wow! One mile, 385 yards to go! Let’s run it in from here! Four or five runners up ahead. Maybe we can take some of them.

A nice steady pace, a little faster than before. The lakes pass, the familiar cracks, holes and textures in the pavement pass. There is the grey-blue museum. Those distant woods are beyond the finish. A runner up ahead is running with his knees shooting out as if he has severe chaffing in the crotch. Passing two or three runners in a group. They just look around with no interest in challenging me. Catch up and pass a black man in his 50s and thus an age-group competitor. He smiles wryly and says “Go to it” and disappears behind. Then the camper and motor home used by the officials are in view. There are still groups of people about.

At last, the finish line. People clapping. “Good run.” “Nice going.” A tall man in a wet raincoat grabs around my shoulder and walks me a few feet saying “Keep moving.” Freeing myself, I jog around looking for my red windbreaker. I find it lying in the open trunk of a car and put it on. With the wind whipping, cold sets in rapidly after stopping running. A cup of hot tea offered by the Red Cross trailer feels good. A cup of water and a nice big red apple (I got the next to last one in the box).

A hot shower felt good; I was suffering no ill effects. Feet fine, no blisters, no chaffing, legs tired, but no strains or pains. Met a fellow in the locker room who had had cramps in both thighs and calves for several miles — he was one of the ones I passed early in the 4th lap. He sat down on the floor to take his shoes off and needed help to get up again.

Thus a successful marathon. Why successful? I don’t even now know my exact time except that it was near 3:50. I don’t know how I placed in the 50’s age group. But the placing in the age group and the exact time are minor against the sense of accomplishment in overcoming the course and myself. To have gotten by the psychological barrier to completing marathons in past tries — I have finished some, but not “run” them. To have overcome the thorn pressed into the flesh upon quitting at 21 miles last year. To have met a personal challenge and overcome it. That is the joy of running a marathon.

A few days after the race the pain and the boredom and loneliness of the event are forgotten. I look at the time — say it was 3:50. That is only 8½ min. miles. Man, you can run faster than that. Look how much you had left at the finish. Where is the next marathon?

REUNION CLASS GIFTS

Although some classes established specific scholarship funds for their class gift, the College counts any gift by a member of a reunion class as part of the total Class Gift.

with violations of rules in these two areas for some time, but only in the past few years has either of them been a factor for women.

Recruiting is a two sided coin. On one hand, it encourages potential student athletes to look at schools they might otherwise not consider and, because of this, administrators and admissions personnel are very much in favor of it. On the other hand, it involves considerable staff time and, in some cases, college dollars.

Without increased staffing to cover the new athletic programs for women and the increased emphasis on recruiting, there is, again, a redirection of energies, away from the average student and toward the skilled athlete. Successful recruiting results in winning teams that, in turn, gain alumni support and institutional recognition. They do not, however, prove very much about the quality of an institution's physical education and athletic programs.

Scholarships generally go hand in hand with recruiting, especially in larger schools. The number and size of such scholarships has a great effect on the ability to attract the top athletes. While the financial aid available makes it possible for some youngsters to attend college who would not otherwise be able to do so, it also promotes an atmosphere where exaggerated statements of the opportunities available are made and excessive demands on the student's time jeopardize academic achievement. Such practices, along with receipt of revenue from spectator admission charges, tends to align athletics more with the business end of an institution than with the overall educational program.

One further aspect worthy of consideration in viewing the overall picture of women's athletics is that of inherent differences between men and women. These differences are quite speculative and therefore difficult to assess. The idea that women tend to be more introspective than men may account for the higher degree of interest in individual and dual sports. Male machismo, which is not a factor with women, may explain some of the attraction of competitive sports for men. Another pertinent factor may be that many people, both male and female, view aggressive competitiveness in women as somewhat unattractive.

Although at times the problems of adequate funding, scheduling of facilities, publicity, adequate staffing of both physical education and athletic programs, recruiting and financial aid seem endless, considerable progress has been made. Thoughtful consideration of differences in needs, interests, motivation and ability between men and women should help to insure that each develops programs that provide equal, though not necessarily the same, opportunities.

The Male Perspective

As an alumnus returning to Middlebury after an interlude of nearly a decade, I found myself, unintentionally but inevitably, making comparisons between “then” and “now.” Having spent some of my Middlebury time on Porter playing fields and in Memorial Field House, I was struck immediately by changes in the athletic scene at Middlebury.

There are new faces on the athletic staff (a woman trainer!), new facilities and fields, and other predictable changes. Teams that once labored in obscurity and struggled mightily for every infrequent win now are the scourge of the New England Small College Athletic Conference.

From my standpoint, however, the most striking change in 10 years is the dramatic increase in interest by Middlebury women in sports and fitness.

My reference is not specifically to women varsity athletes, who have long been a special group at Middlebury. My impression is that a sincere interest in fitness and recreation is now typical of Middlebury women generally. Very few women, I believe, are now like my Middlebury girlfriend of the '60s who wouldn’t go into the field house because she didn’t “like the smell.” (The smell, incidentally, has not changed.)

Often, last year, as I walked home from work, briefcased and bedraggled, I would be hailed cheerily by women runners making their circles around the town. At any time, on almost any day (but especially on clear days in the spring and fall) one can see Middlebury women running, alone or in pairs, along Weybridge Street or Routes 125 and 30, wearing brightly colored turtlenecks and the familiar Middlebury white gym shorts with the thin blue stripe.

On winter days and nights, the six kilometer cross country ski trail around the golf course is used by as many women as men. Even the masculine sanctuary of the weight training room is now feminized frequently by Middlebury sportswomen taking their turns at the equipment.

Middlebury men have always acknowledged that Middlebury women were in great shape. When I was a student here, I had no idea of the shape of things to come.

Karl Lindholm '67
asst. dean of students
Joan Greiner is prof. of physical education at Middlebury. Since joining the College in 1960 she has observed the growth in interest and attention to women's athletics. She offers the following perspective on the current and future state of women's athletic programs in this country. Some of the problems and successes she talks of are shared by Middlebury but her objective here is to provide a general overview.

Dramatic changes in attitudes sometimes occur with disarming suddenness. The changes in women's sports in the last five or six years have been dramatic and, while many in the profession were aware of a gradual transition during the '60s and early '70s, many have been startled by the rapidity with which women's sports turned from very low key, generally informal, competitive activities to full scale, highly competitive, intercollegiate programs.

Title IX legislation has certainly been a factor, but it would have been meaningless without significant changes in attitudes of women toward sport. The idea that participation makes a woman less feminine seems to have become antiquated. There are, however, several factors that influence the degree of participation among high school and college age women.

Many women are more interested in individual than team activities, and growth in schools and colleges has been slower in the competitive area in these sports. They are generally minor sports for men and hence have traditionally been less well funded and publicized.

Lack of early opportunity in sports has led many young women to turn toward other interests. Volunteer work, personal appearance, clothes, dating and hobbies have filled teenagers' lives in the absence of organized sports programs. Many of these interests continue and conflict with the demanding practice schedules of interscholastic or intercollegiate sports. Young women who hope to lead active social lives often feel they must be available to accept dates when invited. Since invitations are generally male-initiated, a young man is in a position to arrange his social life around his sports schedule.

Interest and participation among women has been growing by leaps and bounds, but whether it will ever reach the same level as men's sports depends on how attitudes with respect to these things develop, on how much early opportunity is provided for girls, and on whether or not female athletes achieve the level of social status that their male counterparts enjoy.

The media, influenced by a predominately male audience, has had little incentive to give more than superficial coverage to any but national and international level women's events. This coverage, minimal as “The premise that physical vitality promotes intellectual vitality and contributes to academic performance, as well as to emotional stability, is one which every college and university should embrace and implement.”

David O. Henry, president
Univ. of Illinois

Here at Middlebury College, we feel that the success of any program involving physical education, athletics and recreation must be measured in terms of how well we meet the biological, psychological and social needs of our students, not just by the number of participants. The mental and physical aspects of life are inseparable. The human organism reacts to its environment as a whole, functions as a whole, and creates as a whole. It is impossible to regard the “physical” side of life as something apart, to be healed by physicians, fed by cooks and exercised by physical educators.

Middlebury’s total program might well be likened to a pyramid. The broad base includes the physical education program as well as the many opportunities afforded students by the College's location such as hiking, fishing, hunting, skiing, sailing, canoeing, camping, etc. Higher on the pyramid are programs for intramurals and club sports which involve those students whose interests in team and individual competition is slightly less than those engaged in intercollegiate sports. And, at the top, we find the highly skilled and competitive sports which involve fewer students but which are still necessary to meet the needs of those who wish to perfect their skills and measure them against other highly skilled individuals.

The base of this pyramid is consistently being broadened and developed to include more and more of our students, male and female. We are fortunate at Middlebury in that our geographical location lends itself to many aspects of recreation not available at other institutions. In addition, we have made time and facilities available for simple recreational free play where the student is not subject either to instruction or pressures of intramurals or intercollegiate competition.

In modern physical education programs there is less of a need to talk of, or hold highly, the brittle values displayed on the scoreboard. An appreciation of skill, a cultivated friendship, an understanding of the opponent and his way of life — these are the appreciations which derive from “physical” experiences.

Under the leadership of former athletic director Richard Colman, Jr., the College developed a physical education program stressing “life-time” sports on a co-educational basis, with great emphasis placed on top-flight instruction. The program includes such sports as tennis, squash, golf, swimming, badminton, volleyball, dance, archery, fly casting, canoeing, camping, sailing, scuba diving and cycling. The growth and success of the program can be credited to an increased awareness among Middlebury students of the importance of regular physical exercise for a happy, healthful and fully active life. Further, we feel that we are very close to fulfilling our obligation to see that no Middlebury College student leaves the campus without some skill and interest in at least two sports or recreational activities that will serve him or her in the years ahead.

As our lives become more complex and pressure packed, and as technology takes away from us more and more of the physical activities that earlier generations had as a natural part of their lives, it becomes clear that we need the physical, mental, and emotional relaxation and renewal that comes from activity in a recreational setting.

Having recognized this need, the College has made available to its students a wide variety of recreational facilities such as the Snow Bowl, ice rink, 26 tennis courts, basketball area, workout room, and the multi-faceted Fletcher Field House. This past year the John “Red” Kelly lighted cross country skiing and jogging course was opened and, in the near future, students will have access to a new “back nine” on the golf course and three new outdoor platform tennis courts.

On this sound and fundamental recreational base, the College has built a diversified program of intramural athletics. The intramural program has played an important role in the Alumni Athletics Committee —
Active and Growing

The job of identifying, attracting and assisting student athletes to select a college education at Middlebury is a complex one. Over the years, the coaching staff at Middlebury had had a helping hand from interested and faithful alumni.

Recently, alumni in Boston, Hartford and Darien, Conn., central and northern New Jersey and Rochester and Syracuse, N.Y., along with head football coach Mickey Heinecken and his staff, have begun to meet formally with prospective high school and prep school student-athletes. The objective of these alumni sponsored meetings is to expose to potential students what Middlebury College offers scholastically and athletically. Not only are the athletic programs discussed in detail, but Coach Heinecken, his staff, and alumni do an excellent job in presenting Middlebury scholastics and social life.

The fall and winter schedule has been set for the areas mentioned above, and an alumni group in New Haven, Conn., will also join in to assist in 1977.

The main effort thus far has been in the football area, but the athletics committee will be expanding its efforts to include other sports this year. Tom Lawson, the new athletic director, has indicated his personal support of the program and the support of the coaching staff.

The alumni athletics committee gives a wonderful opportunity for graduates of Middlebury to meet some extremely talented young people and to assist them in selecting a college that can provide them with a meaningful educational and athletic experience.

There is something very special about a Middlebury education and both the athletic dept. and the local athletic committees would welcome your help and involvement. For more information, please write: Peter E. Steinle, 21 Rockwell Place, West Hartford, CT 06107.

Middlebury community for many years. It is felt that this program must be maintained at a level that will bring the values of competition to all who wish to become involved.

One of the important learning experiences that the intramural programs provide is for the development and exercise of student leadership. Teams are coached, managed, and captained by students and student committees have a part in policy and administration; officiating is done by students also. The opportunity is there for a fine democratic experience.

Following hand in hand with the intramural program are club sports. These are programs which offer a higher level of competition but, due to the newness of the particular activity to Middlebury College, must go through an incubation period before being considered for varsity status.

Club sports, such as the women's ice hockey team which is in its second year at Middlebury, are important as they obviously serve the needs of a particular group of students. The athletic dept. provides them with as much support and administrative assistance as possible.

At the pinnacle of the pyramid one finds a well developed program of intercollegiate athletics designed to contribute to the education, growth and development of players and spectators alike. As Byron R. "Whizzer" White, U.S. Supreme Court justice, and Rhodes Scholar has stated: "In athletics, especially competitive athletics, whether team or individual, you get in the habit of training, planning and working for some kind of excellence. Sometimes it takes six months. For a sprinter that whole six months may go down the drain in 10 seconds. You perform then or not at all. A team may train all year and be great in practice, but it's when the whistle blows that it counts. I am in favor of exposing young people to situations that require the highest performance on a regular basis. While athletics are a manufactured environment there comes that moment when you stand face to face with doing. This kind of experience is valuable in maturing one. It contributes to one's self-reliance, initiative and integrity."

Middlebury College's decision to carry a full athletic program is a direct outgrowth of its commitment to quality education and should carry the same weight as the decision to offer laboratory courses in the sciences or creative studio work in the arts.

We assume the purpose of education is not the growth of the mind alone but the development of the total man and that is what our program, with its stress on participation and superior instruction, is designed for. The real test therefore, will be found not just in the acquisition of the skill and knowledge of sport, but in the personal development which will be reflected in the quality of one's life. Our program is essentially an education for life, and its value will be found in the nurture it gives to the student's continuing growth as a person.

Mr. Lawson has served in a variety of coaching positions at Middlebury since his arrival in 1969. This summer he assumed the post of director of athletics at the College.
The psychobiographer, influenced powerfully by this "age of anxiety" and by what Saul Bellow refers to as "this sexually-disturbed century," may lack the detachment necessary to forestall applying a Narcissistic vision of contemporary traumatic hang-ups — identity crises and alienation — to situations hardly compatible and appropriate. In effect, Lebeaux may be excessively laboring a thesis.

But it is easier to disagree with than dismiss Lebeaux's psychological thesis. Young Man Thoreau, a deeply experienced and absorbing study of Thoreau's psyche, is a "guide clue" (Hawthorne's phrase) which reflects in sharp illuminations the play of Lebeaux's mind over his material, and it suggests how the books of great writers sometimes originate in anxiety crises and conflicts, insecurities and rivalries and, above all, in disorientation, quite as much as they originate in joy, ecstasy, exaltation, and rapture. "What will you have?", Emerson quotes God as asking; "pay for it and take it." Young Man Thoreau is the itemization of Thoreau's part payment for Walden. Since the latter is a crystallization of a great writer's message to a disoriented world, I agree heartily with Lebeaux's shrewd statement that "to (Thoreau's) lonely happiness the world will owe the best gifts he has left." They are remarkable gifts of a young man who, on April 5, 1841, when he was twenty-four, would ask rhetorically? "Will it not be employment enough to accept gratefully all that is yielded me between sun and sun?" The next step was the experiment at Walden Pond, and immortality in 1854 with the publication of Walden.

THE IMAGES OF JESUS: EXPLORING THE METAPHORS IN MATTHEW'S GOSPEL

There are some books — and they tend to be the most valuable ones — that not only inform us but also teach us how to think creatively and to discover truth for ourselves. The Images of Jesus: Exploring the Metaphors in Matthew's Gospel is a book of this kind.

On the one hand, as the title indicates, it is a book about the nature and function of the images or metaphors employed by Jesus and by Matthew in their effort to express who Jesus is and what significance his life has for others. On the other hand, it is a book about what the authors conceive to be the central role of metaphor in the intellectual process by which people universally explore and define the meaning in their lives. Further, it endeavors to instruct the reader how to use the metaphorical method of thinking as a tool of self-knowledge and personality integration. Jesus and Matthew are cited as masters of this method. The reader is invited to learn from them and is challenged at critical points throughout the book to create his or her own metaphors guided by a series of ingenious exercises, which the authors tell us have been experimentally proven.

The Images of Jesus will be found fascinating and rewarding reading and practice by church-related study groups as well as by anyone interested in the religious use and general psychological significance of metaphor. The book is not written from any particular dogmatic or confessional point of view.

Fr. O'Connor and Prof. Jimenez base their understanding of the nature and significance of the metaphorical method of thinking on the research and theories of Synectics Education Systems in Cambridge, Mass., and the Psychosynthesis movement, which was founded by the Italian psychotherapist Roberto Assagiolo. From Synectics Education Systems the authors learn that all kinds of problems may be solved by first carefully defining the particular problem at hand, finding an analogy to it (a metaphor), fully developing the meaning of the analogy, and finally transferring the information acquired from the analogy back to the original problem. The authors also follow Synectics in classifying metaphors as either direct analogies (A is like X), personal analogies (I am like X), or paradoxes (A is like not-A) — the last being the most powerful type of metaphor because it synthesizes apparent opposites and pushes us to perceive reality in radically new ways. What constitutes the original contribution of this book from the point of view of Biblical studies is that it is the first sustained attempt to apply Synectics' approach to metaphor in the analysis of the images and actions of Jesus.

The Psychosynthesis movement has led the authors to the conviction that metaphors, especially the "mythic metaphors" of the great religions, are among the most effective means by which individuals and groups discover enduring meaning and harmonize the various aspects of their lives. The authors even go so far as to make the suggestion, which will certainly provoke debate, that metaphor is the principal way human beings can express their understanding of the nature of reality and of that divine truth which liberates and unifies. Drawing from the theories and methods of Synectics and Psychosynthesis, Fr. O'Connor and Prof. Jimenez have given us a fresh, substantive study of the teachings and acts of Jesus as reported in Matthew. Technical questions about Matthew's sources, the date of texts, and the historical Jesus are not their concern. They take the contemporary English version of Matthew in the New American Bible as a reliable translation and analyze the account of Jesus as they find it. Their study provides the reader with a strong sense of a dynamic evolutionary process in Jesus' own thinking as he struggles to understand and to explain himself, his world and his relation to God. The authors are particularly fascinated with the use of paradox in Jesus' metaphors, and they endeavor to show that the paradoxical elements involved in a metaphor can push it to a dramatic breaking point. The central defining metaphor in Jesus' life is seen to be the image of himself as son in relation to God as father, but as Jesus explores the meaning of this metaphor and comes to realize the darker, more frightening aspects of relationship to God, he is forced finally, on the cross, to abandon it. In the resurrection, Fr. O'Connor and Prof. Jimenez argue, the original metaphor of father and son is transcended and then corrected by the image of God as Holy Spirit. The book closes with a moving study of the image of the wind which is of central significance in the Hebrew understanding of the idea of spirit.

On occasion the argument in The Images of Jesus becomes complex, but the presentation is always clear and lively. The interpretation of some passages in Matthew will be found controversial, but serious readers will find the book pushing them to see interconnections and levels of meaning which they had missed before. In conclusion, The Images of Jesus offers us a novel and effective way of rediscovering the meaning and power of Biblical metaphors, and by doing the exercises in the book one can discover for oneself the value of metaphorical thinking. Read it and do it!

KINGKILL
By Thomas Gavin, asst. prof. of English, Middlebury College

In 1826 a German flimflam man named Johann Nepomuk Maelzel appeared in the U.S. and began wowing the natives with his traveling show of mechanical marvels. His treasures included an automated trumpet player, a device called the pana harmicon that could duplicate the sound of a 40-piece orchestra (playing Beethoven) and an elaborate diorama showing the burning of Moscow. But Maelzel's star attraction was a hoax: a chess automaton nicknamed the Turk that took on all comers — and was every bit as talented as the human player cleverly concealed within it. That role was filled by William Schlu mberger, an Alaskan hunchback who, until hitching up with Maelzel, was the second best chess player at the Café de la Régence in Paris. The machine might have conned its way across the country save for a brilliant detective named Edgar Allan Poe, who exposed the secret in 1836. Maelzel and Schlu mberger both died two years later.

So much is history. First novelist Thomas Gavin, 36, reopens this long-closed case with a single question: What if Schlu mberger did not die when the newspapers claimed but lived on in obscurity, composing a private journal of his bizarre life? If such a document existed, it might tell something worth hearing about a chess genius who mysteriously elected to spend 12 years playing inferior opponents while anonymously stuffed in an airless, sweltering box. Gavin asserts that such a document did exist and that Kingkill is based on it. With this single shading of fact into fiction, the performance begins.

A literary stunt? Yes, and well worth the price of admission. Beethoven and Napoleon materialize, as do Concord coaches, corduroy roads and a fully outfitted Mississippi River steamboat. With a few judicious details as props, Gavin creates palpable illusions of scenes 150 years old ...

But Kingkill has more on its mind than special effects. The two main characters, Schlu mberger and Maelzel, lock themselves in a struggle as tense and potentially humiliating as a championship chess match. Maelzel tempts the malformed Schlu mberger into his machinery by using Louise Rouauté, the wife of a mechanic-assistant, as bait. Eventually, Louise disappears but Schlu mberger remains. The Turk frees him from the fear of losing a match publicly and gives him the power to expose Maelzel at any time. For his part, Maelzel exploits Schlu mberger's gift for his own profit and dreams of a truly automated player. Mountebank that he is, Maelzel desperately wishes that the Turk could be a total machine, one that he could control completely.

Careful Planning. The ripples of this struggle extend well beyond the period covered by Gavin's story. Yet the author ... never draws arrows pointing toward buried meanings or underscores the ironies that hover whenever the present looks at the past. The world of Schlu mberger, Maelzel and 19th century America seems to appear and spin spontaneously, a sure sign in art that careful planning was at work from the beginning.

Aspiring authors are regularly instructed to write about what they know. Many of them, unfortunately, know the same things. That is why first novels tend to cluster around a few subjects: growing up absurd, free sex and expensive therapy, anomie in graduate school and the difficulties of writing a first novel. Kingkill is a refreshing and welcome break with this tradition. Gavin writes not only about what he knows but about what he has learned. Meticulously researched and written over a 5 ½-year period, his novel shows how much vibrancy can be taken out of libraries if imagination and talent enter them. Gavin has built a construction just as ingenious and mysterious as the Turk, and it, too, pulses with inner life.

YOUNG MAN THOREAU
By Richard Lebeaux '68

In Young Man Thoreau, Richard Lebeaux '68, presents a remarkably bold, closely-argued, and well-researched psycho-biography of Henry Thoreau's early search for identity. Of compelling interest, this study shows how Thoreau, beset by insecurity, parental ambiguities, fraternal rivalry, Emersonian constraint, and social disorientation, achieved self-identity, and Lebeaux does it without dogmatic diatribe or critical inventive. Despite some repetition, which usually refracts further light, there isn't a dull page in this book.

Moreover, Lebeaux's thesis, the application of Erik Erikson's conceptualization of life-stages to the understanding of Thoreau, is provocative. With Erikson's formulations in mind, he explores "how Thoreau's personal development intersected and interacted with the supra-personal." In Thoreau's early life — but especially following his graduation from Harvard in 1837 until the beginning of the Walden experiment, significantly on July 4, 1845 — we are constantly reminded of identity conflict and confusion, of tendencies toward shame, anxiety, guilt, and even toward despair and self-destruction, and of ambivalence (a key word in this study of clinical categories).

But the question, not wholly resolved in my mind, is whether from the perspective of Erikson's formulations Thoreau's "strange destiny" (as Edward Emerson called it) is unlocked. Or whether Lebeaux's tenacious application of the formulations tends rather to lock Thoreau into a Procrustean bed. On the evidence, how convincing is it that an oedipal situation will account for Thoreau's adult personality? Is Lebeaux's application of the thesis too rigid? The inevitable qualifiers "some-how," "might well have been," "in part," "may be speculated," also trouble me. Lebeaux, an honest and discerning scholar, frequently uses the conditional clause. For example, he writes: "[Thoreau] might have fantasized that he was the cause of his brother's weakness ..." Or, "But he also may have been influenced to stop teaching by guilt feelings ..."
A QUARTER CENTURY LATER — CHANGES IN MIDD-LIFE

The following reflections on Middlebury and recounting of exchanges during the 25th reunion, appeared in The Summit Herald (N.J.) in June, shortly after reunion weekend. Mrs. Burgess has been writing for the editorial page of the suburban weekly for several years.

Alice, a senior at Middlebury College, was participating in “Perspectives,” a program to acquaint the alumni with the changes in the college at their 25th reunion.

“I have to be careful what I say to you, for you are the age of my parents.”

To me, it seems perfectly natural to have a boy’s bathroom across the hall from my room. It seems shocking to think that my dorm once had a barrier that was patrolled to segregate the sexes.”

For me, an alumna listening, this comparison confirmed my feeling of being caught between the morality of my parents and my children. It focused the changes between generations. Such social changes were forcing academic changes . . . and ultimately changes in me.

I had returned to this timeless setting of violet sprinkled meadows and birch spotted hills to review education and renew friendships with three roommates of past years. I found myself stimulated by the humanity and flexibility in education and in my friends.

In the party atmosphere of reunion, we had traveled in conversation from our activities and those of husbands and children to what seemed to be the real question on all our minds.

Marcia opened it. “Have you read “Passages”? (The best-seller reflecting mid-life changes.)

Anne articulated it. “I’m going through a metamorphosis to find more of myself . . . to find out what’s really important to me.”

Four women . . . who are we? Between us we have 11 children, one divorce and one impeding (close to the national average of almost two of four marriages), three hysterectomies, two full-time jobs and two part-time occupations beyond that of wife and mother. Our children are growing away and some are in college.

President Olin Robison, pinpointed the social change in college. “The college is not a parent in absentia.”

Dean of Students, Erica Wonnacott, spoke of one result of the loss of the college parent, the new freedom between the sexes. “There is new warmth and depth in male-female relationships. It is no longer a tragedy if a student doesn’t have a date for Winter Carnival; students go in groups.”

She continued, “The handbook is no longer full of rules but of protection of student rights.”

Today most student dismissals are not for academic failure but in 3 areas of inhumane conduct: drugs (drug use is down but alcohol proportionately up — common in most colleges), 2. inconsideration of other students — flagrant noise etc., and 3. academic dishonesty. Only about 10 per year are flunked out for poor grades; while 25 years ago, 75 out of 200 freshmen were flunked out.

Stop Out, Not Drop Out

The Dean feels that all Middlebury students are smart and if they’re not working, there must be a reason. The administration gives students time out from college, a “stop out” rather than a “drop out,” with no restriction on amount of time or kind of activity. If students leave in good standing, they’re allowed back in.

As social freedom expands, academic freedom is reversing . . . “after 1000 years of unbroken movement toward freedom of choice,” said the Dean of the College, John Spencer.

The college is now requiring Foundations and a Concentration. Foundations supply basic knowledge that many students do not have such as Shakespeare and the Bible. A concentration gives students a secondary expertise, similar to the major-minor system of old. The difference is in a new interdisciplinary direction, showing in courses like anthropology in the Spanish language or art history in Italian.

The $5,000 Change

The change that can put the liberal arts college out of existence is its rising cost: $600—50 years ago, $1,200—25 years ago to $6,000 today and increasing 10 per cent per year. President Robison predicted on New England TV that between 1980-85 liberal arts colleges, other than Middlebury, would close one per week. Students would move toward the less costly more practical vocational school.

What effect would this have? What does this liberal arts college do?

“A liberal arts college prepares you to do — whatever you do better,” said John Spencer.

The students spoke of their gain from college. Joanne, having changed her major six times, learned to focus: “If you’re going to do anything, you have to do it all the way.” Ollie found satisfaction and camaraderie through his involvement in athletics and as liaison between administration and students. Alice changed her major from biology to find a new direction in poetry.

And what has the liberal arts education done for us, four female graduates? Marcia is flying to London by herself while her husband takes over five children. Anne is working full time to enable her oldest to go to college. Mary is driving the 13-hour trip back to Chicago to get to work the next day so she can support a home for her two college-age children. And I am writing this article.
Sports
BY MAX PETERSEN

With talented veteran squads available and several promising newcomers on campus, nearly all of this winter's Panther teams should have good seasons. Of course there are many intangibles that figure into making or breaking any team's campaign, but on the basis of athletes scheduled to participate, the 1977-78 winter season looks like an exciting and successful one.

Hockey: Losing just one defenseman and a pair of forwards from last years squad which posted a 15-6-1 overall mark and was 11-4-1 in Division II play, the Panther skaters are a good bet to be near the top in their division. A key to the final record is good depth in all areas.

Lettermen John Crawford, Bob Davis and A.J. Fitzpatrick give the squad a solid defensive nucleus. Sophomore Frank Nelson, a standout performer on the B team last year, is a good bet to take Woodworth's place.

The Panthers should also be in good shape in the nets with a trio of experienced goal tenders on hand. Back are Bill Burchfield, who did a good job as the No. 1 goalie last year, and backup performers Bob Lloyd and Bill McLaughry.

Sure to give Middlebury a strong offensive punch are the return of last year's two leading lines of Mike O'Hara, Chip Hagy and John Watson and the trio of Pete Bostwick, Perry Babcock and Tom Harris. With several other talented forwards available, the team should again be able to skate four good lines.

Basketball: The hoop team, much in the same enviable condition as the hockey sextet, lost just two players — guard Jim Reese and center Zenon Smotrycz — from last year's 13-10 squad. Young and talented in the 1976-77 season, the Panther courtmen should be tougher following an extra year of experience.

Depth, a vital factor last year when hit by injuries and illness, will again be one of the team's real assets.

Leading the returning backcourt unit are veteran guards Rick Stone and Greg Birsky. Both are strong on defense and Birsky is an excellent ball handler and playmaker for the team.

Among the returning leaders in the forecourt corps are sophomore Kevin Kelleher, the team's top scorer last year, Geoff Sather, Pete Rivoira and Mark Mauniello.

All four are solid players who figured in several Middlebury upsets last year.

The Panthers won the Vermont state title with upsets of Vermont and St. Michael's. They also stunned nationally ranked Brandeis and downed Division II A.I.C.

With these wins to their credit the veteran Panthers should be tough again this year.

Skiing (Women): Twice proven the best in the nation, even though denied the title last year by red tape, the Panther women skiers again appear to be the team to beat.

The Middlebury cross-country unit, undefeated last year, should return intact. Led by national champion Liz Carey, the touring squad also includes Jennifer Caldwell, Lindsay Putnam, Debbie Hutchinson and Janet Kellam. Alice Tower, a freshman who was the top skier in Alaska, will supply added depth.

Although two steady alpine skiers, Tina Bese and Leslie Orton, have graduated, Sara McNealus, second in the nation last year, Ellen Hall and Lori Woodworth will be back to form a strong nucleus for the slalom and downhill squads. Freshmen Sara Hoyt, Laurie Baker and Tammy Hagerty are promising candidates to fill the vacancies.

Skiing (Men): Despite one of the worst showings in the NCAA meet in years with a 12th place finish at Winter Park, Colo., the Panther men had the potential to do much better. Injuries and illness, a new scoring system and the high altitude of the Colorado mountains were major factors in the poor finish. With last year's NCAA back in the East hosted by Dartmouth and several returning veterans, Middlebury is a good bet to finish among the top teams.

Expected back on the cross-country squad is top competitor Jim Goodwin, Phil Mann, and Scott Gillingham, who was ill last year. The decomated unit, which could be the real problem area this year, will get a boost from freshman Jim Renkert, 11th in last year's Junior Nationals. Loaded with talent last year, the touring squad was hard hit by the loss of Brant McDougall, Fritz Koch, Jim Spencer and Jeff Meserve.

Panther jumpers should be stronger this year with four talented performers available. Scott Sobczak, who won the coveted Harris Trophy at Brattleboro, will be back along with rapidly improving sophomores Mike Bloom and Chris Axelson. Freshman John Bassette, third last year in Junior National competition, gives Middlebury a second jumper capable of finishing near the top.

A generally veteran alpine squad, should be solid with the return of Mark Cater, John Jacobs and Dave Gavett. Jeff Nichols, a promising freshman last season, will return along with Blair Childs, who skied well late in the campaign. There are also three freshmen, John Neal, Rick Ross and Wesley Haight, who are expected to supply good depth.

Squash: Highly successful with an 8-5 record last year and a ninth place tie in the nationals, women's squash should be strong again. Middlebury's newest winter team boasts a more experienced squad as it prepares to enter its second campaign.

Leading the Panther racquet women are last year's top players Sue Foster, Nancy Rome and Martha Brownell.

SQUASH MATCH

On this court the ball is everywhere at once.

No ordinary room
the walls bounce back, no space for bed, or lamp or table.

Sport is in the angle speed can cause,
how players love avoiding central tangles.
Yet if he pauses,
lets the ball fly by
and ricochet unhindered,
lets his eye hit hers
say, gently shouting,
quickly, as if a point
were won, they win
and leave the court
unseated.

Gary Margolis is director of counseling at Middlebury College. This year his poems will appear in The Antioch Review and Poetry Northwest. He was once benched in the middle of an inning for letting a ball go through his legs and roll all the way to the wall.
Welcome to the IVORY FOXHOLE

Three Middlebury graduates have assumed new leadership roles in the world of higher education.

William G. Craig ’37, Middlebury College trustee and former chancellor of the Vermont State Colleges, has been named chancellor of the California Community College System. His appointment means a return to California after a 15 year absence.

Mr. Craig, 62, is only the second chancellor in the history of the 104 college system with a statewide enrollment of 1.3 million. His last appointment in California was as dean of men and assoc. prof. of education at Stanford from 1955-62.

Mr. Craig’s career spans 24 years of service to public and private institutions and the federal government, including terms as president of Johnson State (Vt.) College, vice president for academic affairs at the Univ. of Montana, and deputy asst. secretary of HEW under John Gardner in the late ’60s.

Mr. Craig and his wife Lois ’37, will maintain a home in Ripton, Vt., but have moved to new quarters near Sacramento.

Champlain College in Burlington, Vt., has named Robert A. Skiff ’64, of Essex, Vt., to the post of president. Mr. Skiff assumed the leadership of the 22 year old, two-year career oriented school in October. He succeeds the school’s founder and first president C. Bader Broulette.

The 35-year-old native Vermonter has been associated with Champlain since 1967 and, for the past five years, has served as vice president.

Ward H. Dennis ’60, of Pleasantville, N.Y., an authority on Hispanic studies, has been named dean of Columbia University’s School of General Studies. He is the fifth dean of the undergraduate liberal arts school for adults; he had previously served as acting and assoc. dean of the school.

Dean Dennis, 38, a Spanish major at Middlebury, has been director of Columbia’s Institute of Latin American Studies for the past two years. Though he will relinquish that post, he will continue to teach, specializing in Spanish literature.

Norman Kotker has also written a book called The Earthly Jerusalem but it wasn’t until we looked to see what had taken the photographs that I realized he belonged to Zane! A fascinating book, too....Nancy Carboy Woodall is another who is very impressed with our classmates this year — Zane Kotker with her wonderfully reviewed novel, Walt Mears with his Pulitzer Prize and Marcia Stigum on the Today Show talking about her excellent new book on money. Perhaps many of you have read the reviews or seen Marcia on the Today Show and know about her very successful new book How To Turn Your Money Into More Money Quickly and Safely, published in 1976 by Dow Jones-Irwin. Marcia has published other books on economics also....For any of you who have beginning readers or are working with them, I recommend Rosamond Mueller Dauer’s book called Bullfrog Grows Up — the story is charming and the illustrations by Byron Barton are particularly imaginative. Ron has also published some poetry, but I do not have the name of the magazines or books in which they appear....Lucy J. Boyd worked on the Boston telethon this May with Mona Wheatley, Ginny Emerson, Phil and Gail Derick and Judy Tichenor Falkoron. Mona attended the Alumni College in September. I hope others of you will take advantage of this special time next year. This year will be a sabbatical year for Ginny — combined with a half-year leave of absence. She will be studying American History at Wellesley and writing a program to be used at Weston. Thoughts of such an expanse of unstructured time fill her with ecstasy and terror....As of the first of May, Carole (Rusty) Stevens Groselle assumed the position of volunteer coordinator for the public broadcasting facilities of Ohio State Univ....Ron D. Potter, is still functioning as director of admissions at Franklin and Marshall College in Lancaster, Pa. It seems that the time has come when many of our classmates are bringing their children around for college interviews. Ron has had the pleasure in the last month or so of seeing a number of offspring. He and Kathy ’57, have enjoyed seeing everyone and invite them to get in touch if they’re in Lancaster either as tourists or as parents of a prospective student....Wayne W. Williamson started a new job in May, 1977, as v.p. at Keenan & life is much the same except I now live in a house that I’ve ever seen with bullet-proof windows....Wendy Buehr Murphy is free lancing as a writer and editor, having just completed her first book for Time-Life books on Gardening Under Light to be published sometime next year. Since the story is charming and the illustrations by Byron Barton are particularly imaginative. Ron has also published some poetry, but I do not have the name of the magazines or books in which they appear....Lucy J. When is a Poem like an Industrial Park?

"Each poem is one of a kind and each building should be too. But writing poetry is harder than constructing buildings because you never know when you're done."

An odd comparison? Not for Donald E. Axinn '51, who builds buildings and writes poems and uses a similar set of guidelines and creative philosophy for both.

From a handsome penthouse office complex in Jericho, N.Y., Mr. Axinn presides over one of the largest commercial and industrial development firms in the region, responsible for the construction of some six industrial and office parks on Long Island and in northern New Jersey. The Donald E. Axinn Co. has been quite successful during its 20 years, and its founder and president is consulted by investors and educational institutions, and his opinions appear in the N.Y. Times and in all those publications that seek the counsel of economic augurs.

But Donald Axinn is also a poet, and his first book of poetry, Sliding Down the Wind, will be published this January by the small but respected Swallow Press of Chicago.

The Middlebury fine arts major mixes his two lives easily as one can determine from a recent interview in Long Island's Newsday.

"As a builder" says interviewer Lisa Shea, "he is most concerned with design and holds adamantly to the philosophy of the simple curve and the simple line. He described it as tastefulness over flash, continuity over uniformity. His poetry combines these factors, but it can also be playful, musical, reflective, probing, idealistic, sometimes darkened by a sense of injustice and alienation, or gleaming with wonder and surprise.

"Like most poets, Mr. Axinn uses his imagination to shift natural surroundings into vehicles of fantasy...'Everyone fantasizes' he says, 'and I found that some of my fantasy could be worked out through writing. But poetry is really something I backed into, by way of trying to find and interpret answers to some of my experiences, but more so trying to ask the right questions about them...I needed a way of coping with and defining my experiences.'"

"Mr. Axinn insists that it is sometimes necessary to poke fun at the things people take seriously..."We understand work much better than we understand play. But play can also be a way of handling something serious.'"

A former vice chairman and now an active member of the Hofstra Univ. board of trustees, Mr. Axinn also served that institution for two years as assoc. dean of the college of liberal arts and sciences. He also earned his M.A. in humanities with distinction from Hofstra in 1975. Earlier this year he was awarded the brotherhood award of the nassau-suffolk counties region of the national conference of christians and jews.

Michelle Weiller Lapautre (M.A. French) ’54, is considered by many American and French publishers to be the dean of a new generation of French literary agents. Evidence of that came recently when Mrs. Lapautre was elected president of the French literary agents association, Syndicat National des Représentants Littéraires.

The Michelle Lapautre literary agency is the Paris outpost for some 20 leading American publishing houses as well as for the authors of two dozen American and British literary agents, book licensing divisions of movie companies, selected individual authors and for the Book Publishers Assoc. of Israel.

Basically, a literary agent brings an author and his or her manuscript together with a publisher. Add to that task the job of negotiating serial rights, movie rights, paperback rights and so on and the job becomes vastly more complicated.

Now on top of that add in the international rights and the work of bringing an American bestseller (or non-bestseller for that matter) together with translators and publishers in another country, and that is approximately what Mrs. Lapautre does so well.

After receiving her M.A. at Middlebury, Mrs. Lapautre completed a Ph.D. under Germaine Bree at NYU. In the late 1950s she shifted her operations to Paris to complete her thesis on littérature and Nazi collaborator Robert Brasillach. Georges Borchardt, a fellow student at NYU had established his agency in New York and asked Mrs. Lapautre to represent him in France. Borchardt's distinguished reputation on both sides of the Atlantic helped her to get through the early years, trying to overcome the animosity traditionally demonstrated by French publishers toward agents.

"I suppose that I was part of the difficulty," she confesses now, "because of my American mentality. The only approach I knew was a direct one. And there was my obsessive punctuality." Sometimes the disparity between American and French business and personal behavior seemed too deep to be bridged. "Then I began to appreciate French savoir faire, which I hope has rubbed off on me."

She ran the Borchardt Agency from 1960-68 and then went independent. The Lapautre Agency really took off with Erich Segal's Love Story. That half-million copy sale, along with some other breaks, put Mrs. Lapautre in a position to choose her principals. Today, as a rule, she doesn't handle authors unless they happen to be friends...She is concerned about the business getting too big.

One of her greatest satisfactions has been to facilitate the introduction of or the revival of authors who deserve a chance in translation like James Agee or John Cowper Powys.

Mrs. Lapautre is married to René Lapautre and has two children. She works out of her home ("the importance of maintaining an equilibrium between family and professional life") in the Champs de Mars section of Paris.

Between Sets, Overs and Chukkers ... try reading

by Rudolf K. Haeerle, Jr.

These are troubled times in sports. At the professional level we are treated to a barrage of franchise shifts, inflated free-agent salaries, all manner of dissatisfied personalities and bruised egos; at the amateur level, there are reports of creeping professionalism, recruiting scandals, and the disruption and dismay created by Title IX. Old loyalties and certainties of all sorts have been undermined.

Nevertheless, fan interest and attendance levels remain high. And this has been accompanied by another interesting phenomenon: a rapid increase, in the last decade or two, in the number and quality of books dealing with sports or sport themes.

Many people view sports as a means of releasing tension and recapturing some sort of balance in their lives. Here the essence is in active participation as an escape from the realities of life. By contrast, others like to read about sports and achieve a vicarious sense of involvement. The essence here is deeper insight into the human condition. Of course, there is no reason why the two approaches cannot be combined.

One of the most popular books this "season" is Robert Angell's description of the 1972-76 period in baseball (Five Seasons, Simon and Schuster, 1977). Baseball is accused by many of being too slow and uninteresting. But under the deft hand of Robert Angell, the true meaning and spirit of the game are carefully, almost lovingly, revealed. (His opening essay on the ball is a delight!) Initially, I was distracted by his periodic use of rapid-fire, reporter-like notes, but then I realized how effectively this sets up a contrast with the more lucid, insightful parts of the book.

Roger Kahn, in A Season in the Sun (Harper and Row, 1977), devotes his entire book to a series of distinct trips from the majors to the Little League during the 1976 season.

This head-to-head competition for readers is a reenactment of an earlier tussle in 1972, when Kahn's The Boys of Summer (Harper and Row) was published at the same time as Angell's The Summer Game (Viking Press).

In A Season in the Sun, Kahn flits across the country, interviewing such well-known personalities as Johnny Bench and owner Bill Veeck. There is an interesting chapter that contrasts the careers and attitudes of Stan Musial, Early Wynn, and little-known Artie Wilson, who had 21 major league AB's in 1951 but spent most of his playing time in the old Negro Leagues. The common experience of playing professional baseball did not result in similar reactions to the game or similar post-career adjustments.

In contrast to this "romantic" approach, in recent years there have been several exposes and critical evaluations. Paul Hoch's Rip Off the Big Game (Doubleday Anchor, 1972) is probably the most comprehensive and scholarly attempt to explore the relationship between sports and the wider society. Other, more specific studies include Neil Am drut's The Fifth Down: Democracy and the Football Revolution (Coward, McCann and Geoghegan, 1971), Chip Oliver's High for the Game (Morrow, 1971), Jim Bouton's Ball Four (Dell, 1971), Bernie Parrish's They Call It a Game (Dial, 1971), and Gary Shaw's Meat on the Hoof (St. Martin's Press, 1972).

Other books offer different delights. In Martin Ralbovsky's Destiny's Darlings (Hawthorn Books, 1974), we see traced the later adult careers of the members of the 1954 Little League national championship team from Schenectady, New York. Bill Bradley, Rhodes Scholar and New York Knick, provides an intellectual's insights into the game of professional basketball (Life on the Run, Quadrangle, 1976). Reminiscences from the old Negro leagues are heard in John Holway's Voices from the Great Black Baseball Leagues (Dodd, Mead, 1975). Similar period pieces (on the 1930's through the 1950's) are available in two of Don Honig's books on baseball: Baseball When the Grass Was Real (Coward, McCann and Geoghegan, 1975) and Baseball Between the Lines (Coward, McCann and Geoghegan, 1976) and Allison Danzig on football (Oh How They Played the Game, Macmillan, 1971).

A very different, but necessary, book is philosopher Michael Novak's The Joy of Sports (Basic Books, 1976). The reader will either respond intensely to Novak's approach or be turned off by it. However, I do believe anyone interested in sports should be exposed to it. Sports are viewed as a form of civil religion, play as a way out of our contemporary "madness." The marks of religion are there in the form of mystical aspects of the game, rituals and myths, and moral boundaries. Novak may be "heavy" going, but it is well worth the trip.
